

Excellence in Research and Creative Activities

Ediberto Roman, College of Law

Ediberto Roman is a leader in the fields of immigration, citizenship and critical legal theory. A founding faculty member of the FIU College of Law, a former associate dean for Academic Affairs, and current director of the College's Immigration Initiatives, Professor Roman's work has had an impact on public policy debates, particularly in the area of immigration, a subject upon which he has been called to testify in court and on which he has spoken before governmental bodies. In addition to being a sought after public intellectual on these issues, he founded and serves as series editor for the prestigious New York University Press series "Citizenship and Migration in the Americas." In this position, he has contracted over a dozen books from several of the country's leading scholars. In that role, he also actively reviews and edits book proposals and advises the press's board. In the past few years, he has written four books, six law review articles, numerous legal essays and encyclopedia entries, several dozen other essays for his Huffington Post column, and a host of op-eds throughout the country. His first book, The Other American Colonies, was selected as a finalist for the Law & Society Associations James Willard Hurst Prize for Best Work in Legal History. His second, Citizenship and Its Exclusions, was praised as a highly readable and trenchant discussion of historical and contemporary citizenship. His most recent book, Those Damned Immigrants, will surely receive similar acclaim. In addition to regularly working with scholars in his role with the legal academy's leading law series, his articles have been cited hundreds of times by the country's leading law reviews written by many of the most prominent legal scholars and historians.

Ediberto Roman is a leader in immigration, citizenship and critical legal theory. Professor Roman's work has had an impact on public policy debates, particularly in the area of immigration, a subject upon which he has been called to testify in court and on which he has spoken before governmental bodies. He is the author of several books, articles, blogs essays, and op-eds. He regularly works with and has been cited hundreds of times by the country's leading legal and history scholars.